

Sustainable Economic Development

War and conflict have left large parts of Afghanistan's infrastructure destroyed, with public services often non-existent. Efforts to expand electricity and water supplies, transport networks, schools and hospitals have only extended to certain areas of the country, and these services do not meet the needs of the population. Additionally, the country falls victim to seasonal natural disasters, with alternating periods of drought and flooding. Afghanistan is still one of the world's poorest countries. According to the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), Afghanistan was ranked 169 out of 188 countries on the Human Development Index in 2016.

The civil reconstruction of Afghanistan is paving the way for trade and economic growth. Despite positive growth rates over the last decade, the Afghan state is still largely dependent on funding from other countries: 66% of the national budget is funded by the international community. According to the World Bank, Afghanistan's gross domestic product (GDP) stood at USD 19.47 billion in 2016. By comparison, Germany's stood at USD 3.48 trillion. Over half of Afghanistan's GDP comes from the service sector and a further 22% from agriculture. Industrial production accounts for a much smaller proportion. The country is also heavily dependent on imports, while Afghan products can barely compete on international markets.

Because most Afghans depend on agriculture for their livelihoods, there is a particular focus on this area. The priority here is to achieve higher yields in the long term, increase many families' incomes and create new employment opportunities. For this reason, the Afghan-German Cooperation concentrates on the provision of advisory services and training
